

I am appalled that Sinclair Broadcasting will be airing a blatantly partisan documentary against John Kerry just days before the election.

That Sinclair may do so points to the growing problems of consolidation of the public airwaves in the hands of a few large companies. I have already ceased watching any programming on Sinclair's local stations -- but for how much longer will it be possible to find any local programming not controlled by some far-off monopoly using the public's airwaves to disseminate partisan propaganda?

Sinclair's latest action proves the urgency of strengthening media ownership rules, not weakening them. Thank you.
